History of Japanese Sake

A main ingredient of Japanese sake is rice. Rice growing has started approximately 2500 years ago in Japan, which has been mentioned even in the oldest chronicles of Japan called the Nihonshoki. By the Heian era (900's), the method of making sake became almost the same as the current way after introducing different cultures and techniques from China. Then in the Edo era (1600's), sake was designed and produced in each region-throughout the country using their traditional production methods, which have still seen even now. Moreover, sake is regarded as a sacred item, which is also called to be a "thing to be placed within a God's territory". There is a tradition in Japan, in which sake is always offered to the God for praying to seek his teaching (this sake is specially called "sake for the God").

It may sound difficult, but you will find your favorite Japanese sake by focusing on flavors and tastes as a standard (see the following map for your reference).

There are over 1600 breweries in Japan.

The taste of sake varies due to different climates and cultures in each region.

Generally, those from the eastern Japan (Hokkaido, Tohoku, Kanto and Koshinetsu areas) are said to have an elegant flavor, while the western Japan (Chubu, Kansai, Shikoku and Kyushu regions) produces sake with a powerful taste.
